Sarvodaya through Gram-Dan

WHATEVER be our religion, language, caste or creed, we are the sons of the same Father. We are all related to one another. But to-day we have forgotten that one Father—the Lord of all creations. That is why we couldn't get united and become happy. Our society have become partitioned into three separate divisions. Some are called the high class, some the middle-class and those at the bottom, the low class. The high class people have nothing but contempt for their brothers of the low class. Rarely do they show any affection to these poor brothers with whom they have to be in contact in their every day life. They think and say "these people are fools, they have no brain in them to work intelligently, they are idle and often do steal; they have no respect for truth; they have to be supervised, or else they won't work properly; if they are given money they won't use it discreetly but will squander and waste it." They are thus simply considered as beasts of burden.

People of the low-class think that the high class people are cruel, wicked and deceitful. They work in their fields and shops and do often praise them in their face though they don't like them and have nothing but hatred towards them in their hearts. For help they go to the high-class people and if it is not received they abuse them. If help is given they say "Yes, to-day they have given something but tomorrow they will take it back hundredfold from us, Who knows what sufferings at their hands are in store for us ?”

Thus though neither can live without the other the one above condemns the one below and the one down hates the one above.

These three divisions in society should give up their wrong attitudes towards each other. They should forget their differences and become one identifying with each other. Then only will society become strong. They should co-operate with willing hearts and thus serve as the strong and equal props of the tripod of society. Bhoodan is aiming to achieve this. We appeal to those who have enough physical strength to offer their willing labour to the good of the whole society. We appeal to the rich and the wealthy to voluntarily offer Sampattidan for the common benefit of all. We appeal to the owners to voluntarily surrender their right of ownership over land and accept the ideal that land can be owned by society alone.

Our people, whether they belong to the high, middle or low-class, have one good trait in them and that is faith and devotion to Dharma. They put implicit faith in the words of good and saintly persons. Once they understand truth and the real Dharma, they begin at once to practise it. We have to go from village to village, from door to door and make the people understand the basic ideal behind Bhoodan. This is real Satyagraha and we should go on doing it with love in our hearts and faith in truth and in the ideal. It should be done till all understand us. Our people are such that once they get the light and realize their Dharma, they will be quick to act and none can draw them away in any other direction. Thus our society is now getting reformed day by day.

The days of violence and loot are fast disappearing. Changed values of life are being recognised now in our society. People are offering me land. What strength is there in me but that of truth and love? More than 200 villages have been offered to me so far in Koraput district as gramadan by the villagers.

Wherever full villages are received for Bhoodan, there will be no more of the rich man's contempt for the poor, the poor man's hatred for the rich or the jealousy or rivalry among the middle class. All will become equals. There will be none high, none low, and none in between the two. Of course there will be some differences but those variations will be only such as are found among the five fingers of the hand. All the fingers co-operate and jointly do a lakh and odd things. People should co-operate and jointly work like the five fingers; they should live as the five Pandavas lived; they should mix and mingle like the five elements of nature. When this happens our society will become free of scorn, hatred and rivalry and there will be love, full respect and co-operation between individuals. Then every one will grow and all will become equal. Such is the Sarvodaya Order of Society. Such of those villages that are offered as full dan will witness this real picture of Sarvodaya. In them all the villagers will say that all land in the village belongs to the village in common and all the wealth and intelligence of the people therein will be utilized for the benefit of all in the village. Each will feel that he lives for others, and he will not think of himself but will think of others.

And every one in the village will look after every other and the common good of the village will be the one concern of each and every one therein.

(Meghina—Koraput, 12-1-'55.)

Gramdan or Villagisation of Land—Why and How

I

THOUGH I am incarnated in one body my relationship with others continues. It is necessary to be aware of this broader and all-inclusive relationship before one can hope to realise the atman. Gramdan is not a big thing by itself. But it is the first lesson in understanding that there can be no happiness and peace in isolation. The mind creates false sense of separateness. The division of "I" and "You", "thine" and "mine" is an illusion of the mind. This has to be conquered. Life is one whole and there is no division. If some one hates me I must accept that I have not attained real love in my own heart. Because what is without is within and vice versa. Gramdan will fulfil itself when it helps us to experience this oneness of all life.

2. Bhoodan is not a movement but an ascension. The more you climb up the larger is the vision that opens out before you. In the beginning most people were sceptical and wondered if I could get any response. But people have gradually opened their hearts which has emboldened me and I am now asking for Taluk-dan and District-dan.

3. Possession of land is as much a sin as theft. That is why land should be owned by the village. But accumulation of wealth is a greater sin.

4. It is necessary to remove this ignorance and fallacy. Knowledge and love can help people understand that the sense of possession should go. Life can be transformed through thought. Gramdan has to be brought about by persuasion and love. Love lends power to thought, provided we ourselves have love in us.

5. I have no doubt that the people will increasingly see the truth behind gramdan. Nature is so generous. Land is for all. When land ceases to be owned privately a new relationship will come into existence between the people of every village. Today, the smaller and poorer landholders are clinging to their meagre holding. The biggest landlords will not give up their ownership until the smaller have first given it up. In Bihar we succeeded in getting lakhs of acres because hundreds of small land-holders gave up their land first.

6. Private ownership in land can never remain. It has to go. Great thinkers all over the world have testified to this thought. Sixty years ago, Tolstoy preached that private ownership in land was immoral. The time-spirit speaks through such men. Subrahmanya Bharathi, the great poet of Tamilnad, had been saying the same thing some forty years ago. Surely he had no illwill towards the landlord. He was a great patriot and lover of Tamilnad and wrote out of real compassion. "Have compassion for the opponent" was his prayer. When such a person says something is it not the voice of God or the time-spirit? Take one of the ancient Tamil classics, the Thirukural. It has said, "Do not forget that even the bones in your body are not your private possession." He who has love in heart has no sense of possession. Whatever he has he gives for the good of all. The land problem in India and Asia can be solved overnight if all care to act according to what men of wisdom have taught us.

7. The Vedas have also said that land is the mother of all. "Matha bhumi Putroham prithivyaha". All religions speak with one voice that land belongs to all. The spirit of the age is again demanding the closing of private ownership. Why not then accept this with humility and goodwill?

8. Men of God like Manickavachagar and Nammalwar in Tamilnad have demonstrated that it is possible for a person to give up all sense of ownership, even of his own body. Society honoured and adored such men. But people never imitated them. They said these were exceptional men. Today we see people are giving Gramdan freely, i.e., they are giving up their ownership over land. This is a tremendous achievement. It shows that men are capable of real large-heartedness. The climate of opinion all over the world is undergoing transformation. For instance, if Egypt was attacked by France and England 50 years ago, could there have been any power in the world who would have cried halt to them? They would have bombed the whole of Egypt out of existence and gone scot-free. But today we saw that the whole world condemned Britain and France for their unjust aggression. World conscience has begun to raise its voice and world opinion is gathering strength now.

9. Many doubted if Gramdan would make much headway in Tamilnad. No one believed that it would be given in this State. I, for one, never shared these doubts. I felt certain that what had happened in Bihar and Orissa would happen in Tamilnad. After seven months of persistent work there is a visible change. Gramdan is in the air. Every day a new Gramdan is being reported. It must be noted that Gramdan in Tamilnad is not the same as Gramdan in Orissa. In Koraput, Gramdan began in an area that was hilly, sparsely populated and inhabited by Adivasis. But in Tamilnad conditions are quite different. Here land is fertile. Population is not sparse. People are educated. The message of Gramdan has the power to influence the men of simple faith as well as the intellectuals.

10. We are building up a new society in the villages. The village republic is our ideal but that does not mean that we should neglect the intelligentsia who live in the towns. Our Universities must be made to take note of Gramdan and make their own contribution for the development of the Sarvodaya pattern of society.

11. What do we mean by achieving the Bhoodan revolution in this year?—We mean, first, to establish the right of the landless labourers over land. That is the beginning. Then the next step would be to say all would be the owners of land. Just as we all share light, air, and water alike land should become common to all. This brings us to the present stage when we say that no individual can own land. All land belongs to the village, that is, to the village community. When we talk of a particular target within a time limit it is only an expression of the sense of urgency and the importance of the cause. The Time-spirit is with us and therefore things that would have taken fifty years before, are being now achieved in a month or two.

II

12. In Gramdan villages individual ownership comes to an end. But in another sense it increases. An individual owns no land, but he can very well say that all land belongs to him. Just as a mother has a ubiquitous authority in the house, or a little baby has common rights so an individual citizen will have power and rights in the village. Whatever is done for the development and welfare of the individual will add to the social well-being and strength. Just as money is kept in a bank today it will be invested in society in Gramdan villages. It removes insecurity and anxiety. Sarvodaya looks on life as an integrated whole. It believes that the individual and society are indivisible.

13. I admit that if people have given Gramdan after understanding its implications, the result will be definitely for the good. Equality is a blessing. It is bound to make for happiness. Does not the peasant level his field? He knows how a field yields better when it is levelled and made even. The same is true of society. Social equality is the real strength of the people. God's universe moves by the Law that is even at the bar of the scales. In the Koran the Prophet has said the Lord created the scales. Justice means equality. Does not the sun give light and warmth to all equally? If he were to discriminate what would happen to us? Death treats us all equally. He visits the rich and the poor with impartiality. It is the idea of "mine" and "thine", or in other words, it is the inequality which we create out of our greed, which is at the root of all our suffering and conflict. Equality is solvent but we are afraid of it.

14. The exponents of the theory of incentives forget that if higher gains induce me to greater efforts it may also tempt someone else to rob me. The theory of incentive is bound to create inequality and conflict. Security and peace can come only when there is equality. Gramdan is the road to prosperity and happiness. Individual ownership in land is not going to last. When you understand the truth of this you will not hesitate to give whatever you have to the common pool. There is a joy in giving and sharing.

15. Let us be very clear about the main object of our movement. Redistribution of land in a village is only the first step. Our movement aims at creating a new man; not only in India but also all over the world. It is worldwide in its implications. We are restricting the scope of our activities only to our country just now; because we feel that if we could show results here it is bound to affect the world. Land distribution in India is only the first step of the movement. When we say that land belongs to God it really means that it should be free for use for all the men in the world. It should be open for the beasts and the birds also. Some States in India are very densely populated. For instance, in South Kerala the density of population is two thousand per square mile, while in Vindhya Pradesh it is only two hundred. Similarly in Australia there is plenty of unoccupied space. If immigration is free, five times the present population can live there. But the Australians do not desire that outsiders should come there and disturb their security and culture. In this age of science such parochialism can have no place. We must have large minds and hearts and learn to think of the whole world as one. That is the only way to peace.

16. Bhoodan is not a reformist activity. It aims to bring about a radical change in society. It wants to do away with all the class divisions that exist today. It wants to create real equality. Gramdan may be said to lay the foundations of the new order. It ends private ownership in land.

17. When a village is given in Gramdan people begin to speak of "we" and "ours". That is a first lesson in the way of devotion. And as people begin to value work for common good, selfish desire begins to disappear. "We" and "ours" is also ultimately transformed into "unto Him". Everything that we do, we do by God's will and dedicate it to Him. Bhoodan wants human society to take this step. Gramdan is the first lesson in the new way. The people of a Gramdan village share their joys and sorrows together. Man does not exploit man. Sorrow and suffering of one is shared by all. Men will work according to their talents for the common good. A teacher, a singer, a craftsman, a farmer, each will follow his vocation. The village will give each a share from the annual harvest. All will feel as one and share a common life.

18. I feel that Gramdan and the way of true devotion will spread rapidly. People in South have that feeling. The temple will be the place where the people of the village will meet and listen to religious discourses and devotional songs. Devotion will express itself in all their day-to-day activities. Devotion means compassion, friendship and respect. Every one will have all the three ever present in one's heart. The fact that we are getting Gramdan shows that the stream of devotion has not dried up. We must "dig channels" and carry the waters of true devotion to every door. Bhoodan is trying to do this.

19. I expect that villages which have more land would invite a few landless from other villages to come and settle down in their village. But these are questions for the future. Let us concentrate for the time being on getting Gramdan and explain the implications of it very clearly to every person. Then there will be no difficulty. Our people are large-hearted and they will learn to accommodate all.

20. Some people say that I have come to abolish ownership. Today everyone owns a little piece of land or property and is a small owner. That only makes people petty, narrow-minded and quarrelsome. So they become slaves of their servants. I want them to give up their petty ownership so that they will become masters of their own destiny which is something great.

21. Today they are disunited and weak. Anybody can go and disrupt their life, bring misery and poverty to them. Some one comes and starts an oil mill and as a result there is unemployment. The villagers are helpless against the mill-owner. But if it is a Gramdan village, or a Gramdan Taluk, they will be able to withstand any outside attack successfully. Therefore even during the election I am going from village to village spreading the idea of Gramdan.

22. Gramdan is the expression of the spirit of the age. It asks people not only to break the narrow domestic walls and consider the whole village as one family but goes further and asks all the villagers to meet together to consider their common problems and solve them with one mind. There are problems of drinking water, irrigation, education, sanitation, employment and hundred others. The villagers must tackle them together. No one will have any exclusive interest. Whatever one does for himself will be also for all.

23. When a man ceases to think of his person and dedicates himself to the good of the society he will be happy. It is the identification of oneself with the body or self-aggrandisement that brings in misery and unhappiness. When a man will come to think about the good of the community he will have found the key to happiness.

III

24. This is the essence of Gramdan. In it there is no individual possession of land, labour and wealth. Each owns everything. Each will offer his all to the community and the community will take care of him. People think it a great sacrifice to give Gramdan. Gramdan is not a sacrifice but a sound investment in good living.

25. Even in villages which are small with barely a hundred families there is no social cohesion or comradeship. Each one lives for himself and all of them are exploited ruthlessly by the trader, money-lender, advocate and doctor from the town. They also exploit one another when they can. Isolation corrodes the human feeling in man. Like the erosion of the soil there is a deterioration in the quality of human beings. The intrusion of the money economy has made things worse. There is litigation between father and son. Marriages in the family add substantially to the indebtedness of the householder. All this has reduced man to the position of a beast. He has lost all sense of human dignity.

26. In a Gramdan village all this will change. Man will live in happy union with the society around him. The whole village will be one family. Private ownership in land will end. No debts will be incurred for a marriage in the family. The whole village will contribute towards the expenses.

27. There will be one shop in the village. Every householder will have his "labour-hours" entered into the register to his credit. He will not be exploited by the trader from the town. People will learn to live together in happy co-operation.

28. Gramdan substitutes a wider ownership in place of the narrow ownership. Today they are busy electing representatives and ministers. The voters are the real masters. The elected representatives are the servants. But in actual life the anonymous voter is forgotten and has no initiative or power. In Gramdan all this will change.

29. All the affairs of the village will be in the hands of the people. They will decide what they want to do. You will have a sense of owning all the land of the Taluk together. So we are asking people to throw off the burden of individual ownership. Individual ownership is the root cause of our unhappiness and slavery. If individual ownership in land is ended a new co-operative and collective social life will emerge. Every family will work for the good of the village and a new life will emerge if the whole taluk lives and works as one family.

30. As an example, in a village of a hundred families, each family will be represented by one person. The hundred persons will form the General Village Council. It will meet once in a month. This Council will unanimously nominate 10 to 15 people who will form a committee. This committee will meet more often and will be responsible for the day-to-day administration of the village. The decisions of the committee will be ratified by the Council. The General Council may be said to be a policy-making body while the smaller committee will be its executive branch.

31. It is a moral pressure. People know that the absentee landlord cannot live without the help of the villagers. When all the people in a village come together and act as one family they create a moral force which has an effect on other people including the absentee landlord. The absentee landlord will be 'impelled' by inner conviction or sense of social guilt. He will not be subjected to any violent pressure.

32. Gramdan is a beginning and not an end. It only lays a firm foundation on which a new society can be built up. You can form a village republic when you are self-sufficient. The village carpenter, the tailor, the oilman, the weaver must now get employment in the village itself. You must not allow private ownership in land to grow up again. Land belongs to God.

33. The outstanding debt will be taken over by the village community. Attempt will be made to reduce it by negotiations with the money-lender and whatever remains would be paid by annual instalments by the whole village. No one will be free to raise new loans individually. Even marriages would be celebrated by the village community. These difficulties will vanish when lakhs of villages are given as Gramdan. The money-lender will then begin to appreciate the significance of the change.

34. Security and safety can be had only if we learn to think and work for the good of all. Those who have wealth must give a part of it willingly for the good of society. Land will belong to the whole village. Gramdan is something more than the pooling of land. It is an initiation into a new way of thinking and living. You will experience a new joy, energy and enthusiasm not experienced before.

35. The feeling of sanctity in private property has probably grown because of the family system in India. People are afraid that the family system would disintegrate if private property comes to an end. The family is an ancient institution. It helps man to develop consideration, control and sympathy. No doubt, it has been one of the civilising influences. Gramdan does not aim at breaking the family system. On the contrary it is an attempt to extend it to the whole village. In fact, private property has been responsible for creating divisions in the family. Bhoodan is broadening and widening the family feeling to the whole village.

There is also a feeling that once land is pooled together and private ownership is ended the owner will become just a labourer. This also is a wrong idea.

36. Gramdan is a new discovery, but it should lead to greater thought and investigation. How will it help in building up an integrated society in which there is no exploitation and rivalry or inequality? It is quite possible that differences may arise between two Gramdan villages. Disputes can become serious and there may even be clashes. How can this be prevented? Gramdan by itself is not a panacea which will solve all our problems. The need of constant thought, vigilance and investigation is ever there. That is why it is very important that all the implications of Gramdan should be discussed by the villagers. Village workers should study the various problems that arise in the village and find out how they can be solved in the spirit of Sarvodaya.

37. I am looking forward to the day when all the five lakh villages would be given as Gramdan. Who would then be responsible for development in all these villages? Even the Government will find it very difficult to cope with the problem. It may be beyond their capacity.

38. In a Gramdan village the dynamics must be provided by the people themselves. Their urge to bring about a change can be the only effective agent of development. Otherwise it would be like a body without a soul. In some countries attempts were made to awaken feelings of envy, rivalry, spite and hatred to create a social dynamics. But it created more violence and ill will. We must rely on love and goodwill in this work.

39. It will be beyond the power of the Government to give help to all villages even if the Gramsabhas were to ask for it. If we had considered development work as a private responsibility we would never have asked and received thousands of villages in Gramdan. The Gramdan villages will be disappointed if they look forward to outside aid. Bhoodan movement is a movement of giving and not taking. So the poorest has first to give at least his labour.

40. The meaning of Gramdan is a solemn resolve made by the villagers to manage their own affairs. They will take all the decisions henceforth. It is their law which will prevail in the village. They will decide how land should be distributed and cultivated and what should be grown. They will decide that they will make their own cloth; that it will be woven on a handloom. The Government will not be able to force power-looms on the villagers. In all the spheres of activities which are vitally and directly related to the life of the villagers the Government will accept the decisions of the villagers.

41. We have got over 200 villages of Gramdan in the district of Madura. I would like to distribute them to the Congress, P. S. P. and Communist workers for development. It will be a good experiment. All of them will realise how much they have in common when they apply themselves seriously to the actual work of development in a constructive spirit. A constructive worker has to work at both the ends simultaneously. He has to purify his heart and mind and serve the people. I have no doubt that the kingdom of righteousness would soon be realised.

42. If ownership in land goes, ownership of factories and houses will not lag behind. If all the villages in a taluk are given as Gramdan can townships and cities remain unaffected? Can they run away to some other place? They will naturally fall in line with the villages and begin to serve them.

43. They will not exploit the villager. The same is true of money-lenders. Giving money to the needy is really not a debt; it is really a dan. The money-lenders will have to change their lives. They will be looked after, as the ruling princes are being looked after by India, provided they accept to live and work like the other villagers.

44. But let it be understood clearly that increasing agricultural production is certainly not the aim and object of Bhoodan and Gramdan. That would be only incidental. Its main object is to widen man's loyalty to the entire society. It hopes to create a climate where man will feel the same solicitude for the least in society as he feels for his own children. Gramdan will end duality between individual and social life. They would be like the two sides of a coin. This is bound to bring about greater production and happiness. But if for some reasons production did not increase it would not matter. Gramdan, thus, is trying to give a new vision or a purpose to people. Human life is full of joy and suffering. People can fight bravely against calamities that befall them. Floods and cyclones devastate lands every now and then. Man shares calamities and in sharing gets the strength to conquer them.

45. It is obvious that every one must have a minimum of food, clothing and shelter. Elementary wants must be satisfied. But man thirsts after something more. Though he spends most of his time in earning a living and is ever worried about some material want, he is never satisfied till he finds some purpose or significance in life. There is, if I may say so, a spiritual hunger in him which worldly possession can never slake. The elaborate religious rituals which we find in all religions are an attempt to supply this inner need of man. People offer elaborate worship to the idols, read religious books, undertake arduous pilgrimages, give charity in order to quench the deep hunger for real communion. Surely, none of these brings any material return to them. But it does give them an inner spiritual satisfaction.

46. I hope that the young men of our country will be filled with enthusiasm and will dedicate themselves to Gramdan. It is not enough if we get a Gramdan here and there. Whole talukas and districts must be given in Gramdan. There is so much talk about the five-year plan in the country. But so long as this fundamental transformation does not take place planning from the top will not end the poverty and misery of the villagers. Gramdan is the foundation of social reconstruction.
